To backup a SQL Server instance, right-click the database you want to back up, then select the Restore option. Restore defaults to save to a new file. You can also select the default file and location to restore to. If you select the same file and location as the backup location, the backup will be overwritten. For more information, see the following articles: Backup a SQL Server instance: The backup process is not continuous, and only includes a partial copy of the data. Once the restore is complete, the database must be repaired. For example, a database error or a system crash may corrupt data. If you try to restore a damaged database, the restore process will fail. However, you can use the use the sys.database_recovery_status function to find out which files on disk have been successfully restored. For more information, see the following articles: Restore a SQL Server instance: The database must be completely restored before the database is functional. Restore will not repair or replace corrupt data. 5ec8ef588b
